Tobacco Group Challenges Cancer Study

REPORTERS AT THE [in a paper to the A.M.A.] American Medical Association today.

Immediately after two convention got a double dose of the cigarette controversy yesterday. Immediately after two physicians told the press of their study showing that dogs that smoke cigarettes develop cancer, representatives of The Tobacco Institute showed up to present the rebuttal. The tobacco people argued that it is "highly suspicious" that the study was sponsored by an animal rights group.

The tobacco people argued that it is "highly suspicious" that the study was sponsored by an animal rights group. The study also has attracted the attention of humane societies, which believe that animals should not be taught such habits.

Dr. E. Guyler Hammel of

New York City, and Dr. Oscar

Auerbach of East Orange,

N.J., will present their findings
